

NCLA Wins Repeal of Judicial Deference Doctrine by Sixth Circuit

U.S. v. Jeffrey Havis

WASHINGTON, DC- Today, the full Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed its prior decision and ordered resentencing in United States v. Jeffery Havis. In no uncertain terms, the Sixth Circuit concluded that certain sentencing enhancements set forth by the U.S. Sentencing Commission, in unapproved commentary, cannot be used as a basis for increasing a federal prison sentence. The Commission's formal guidelines must be approved by Congress, and the Commission bypassed that process here. As a result of today's decision, Havis, who was sentenced to 46 months in prison, will most likely get his sentence reduced by more than half under the recommended Sentencing Guidelines. This decision will also impact hundreds of other criminal defendants within the Sixth Circuit.

While courts may consider an agency's views and adopt them when persuasive, prior Sixth Circuit law erred by instructing lower federal courts to treat the Sentencing Commission's commentary as "authoritative." Mandatory deference raises due process and other grave constitutional concerns. The decision of the Sixth Circuit as a whole corrected circuit law and reined in undue—and unconstitutional—deference.

"Today the Sixth Circuit forcefully told the U.S. Sentencing Commission that as an administrative agency it cannot establish federal sentencing policy without seeking Congressional approval. The Commission had decided on its own to dramatically increase the presumptive prison sentences for a whole class of federal defendants. This decision not only rebukes the Commission's policy but will result in the much lower prison sentences that Congress actually approved." —Caleb Kruckenberg, Litigation Counsel, NCLA

NCLA filed an amicus brief in November urging the full Court to correct its circuit law.
